Excerpt: .you want to make a name for yourself in the service? I left the ground two feet below me in my fright and when I alighted there were tears of eagerness in my eyes. Yes, I replied breathlessly, oh, sir, yes. Then pick up that, he cried dramatically, pointing to a cigar butt on the parade ground. I didn t wait for the laughter. I didn t have to. It was forthcoming immediately. Huge peals of it. Sailors are a very low tribe of vertebrate. They seem to hang around most of the time waiting for something to laugh at--usually me. It is my belief that I have been the subject of more mirth since I came to camp than any other man on the station. Whatever I do I seem to do it too much or too little. There even seems to be something mirth-provoking in my personal appearance, which I have always regarded hitherto not without a certain shade of satisfaction. Only the other day I caught the eyes of the gloomiest sailor in camp studying me with a puzzled expression. He gazed at me for such a long time that I became quite disconcerted. Slowly a smile spread over his face, then a strange, rusty laugh forced itself through his lips. Doggone if I can solve it, he chuckled, turning away and shaking his head; it s just simply too much for me. He looked back once, clapped his hands over...
